Health Nugget

The most comprehensive summary of evidence on diet and cancer ever compiled recommends we should eat mostly foods of plant origin to help prevent cancer. This means centering one’s diet around plant foods. Not just whole grains and beans every day, but every meal. When it comes to foods that may increase cancer risk, the recommendations are similarly bold. The guidelines don’t mince words when it comes to naming the worst of the worst. For example, don’t just minimize soda intake, avoid it altogether. Don’t just cut back on bacon, ham, hot dogs, sausage, and lunch meats, but avoid processed meats, period, because the data do not show level of intake that is without major risk to one’s health. (To be continued next week).
