Health Nugget

Forty-five adolescents underwent four consecutive nights of monitored sleep restriction (6-6.5 hrs/night) and four nights of sleep extension (10-10.5 hrs/night). At a fixed morning time, cognitive performance was assessed using a computerized neuropsychological battery including an IPS (information processing speed) task. Conclusions: Adolescents’ ability to process information may be especially vulnerable to sleep loss. Under ideal sleep conditions, however, they seem to be able to achieve optimal performance, particularly on more challenging problems. (JINS, 2016, 22, 388–398)
